Folks:

POSTAL REGULATORY COMMISSION

My newscaster just advised that the post office is going to stop sending mail by air and only use trucks. If you are worried about costs, why not just charge more for air mail like you used to. More trucks on the road is not what we need in this time of pollution and global warming. Plus, this would slow the mail down even more than you did during the last election.

I read about undelivered packages stacking up on loading docks because of these slowdowns. Like fruit rotting, and animals dying. So, my fruit of the month delivery is likely to be rotten and my easter chicks probably will be dead. The millions of flowers you used to handle will be wilted. There goes those markets.

The invention of the airplane was a big deal, and the Post Office was one of the first, and probably longest lasting, business to use planes. How can we even think of eliminating that efficiency when, at the same time, the President says we want new technology, like an all-electric post office fleet on the ground?

Please think about it.

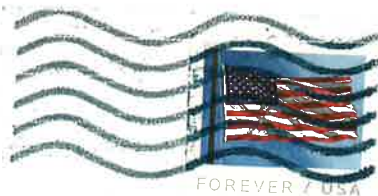

There's got to be another way.
